The police will no longer enjoy blanket immunity from being sued for negligent acts committed in the course of operational duties. A landmark Supreme Court judgment, handed down last week, has removed the so-called "Hill principle", a doctrine effected by the case of Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1989] A.C. 53. The Hill principle held that the police owes no duty of care to members of the public in relation to action taken in the course of suppressing crime.

Qualified immunity is a defense police officers and other state officials can raise in legal actions against them. It is a legal doctrine created by the Supreme Court in 1967 - not a statute. Under the qualified immunity doctrine, a police officer can be shielded from liability if at the time they acted: They were performing a "discretionary" function

The protections provided by Garrity are in addition to a separate legal benefit created by the U.S. Supreme Court that's available to all public employees but mostly protects cops from accountability - qualified immunity. Where qualified immunity largely shields cops from civil liability, Garrity shields them from criminal liability.
